Environmental pollution can be described as a deadly earthly disease that affects plants, animals and humans. It is caused due to excessive burden of natural resources by an ever increasing human population. Pollution poisons the atmospheric air we breathe by depleting the ozone which is a protection halo encircling the earth. Use of chemicals in agricultural activities, industrial waste and fumes emitted pollute land, rivers, seas and atmosphere. Chasing animals away from the natural habitat into dangerous human territory, where they stray in search of food and become prey to humans. Environmental pollution is an unnatural cyclical ring, which declines human health resources, pure food, water and air; hazardous climate changes and ruthless natural calamities. (6)
